

Have you ever been betrayed by someone close to you before? If you're one of the few lucky people who haven't been stabbed in the back before – well, good for you. As for the people who know exactly what I'm talking about and hated the feeling of betrayal just as much as I did, here are the reasons why I value loyalty above everything – not only when it comes to my friends but also when it comes to my partner.

To me, loyalty doesn't only mean not to cheat on your partner in a relationship. It also means sticking to each other's side, no matter what. It means supporting each other, having each other's back and being there, when it gets tough. Of course, honesty is important as well but imagine your partner telling others things that were meant to stay between the two of you. Except, what is your partner supposed to do? They're just being honest after all.

I know loyalty isn't all that amazing when you think more about it, like lying to your partner in order to keep them from getting hurt. In this example, honesty would be the better trait to look for but when I weigh out the options, I'd still stick to my opinion and say: loyalty is the most important character trait in a person to me.

Of course everyone has the right to their own opinion and I'd understand if you said you value honesty or intelligence or kindness or whatever more. We're all different people who look for different things in other but I hope this text helped you understand why I personally value loyalty the most.
